David Clapham, Jozsef Hegedus, Keith Kintrea, Ivan Tosics : Housing Privatization in Eastern Europe (Contributions in Sociology (Hardcover)) before purchasing it in order to gage whether or not it would be worth my time, and all praised Housing Privatization in Eastern Europe (Contributions in Sociology (Hardcover)):

This book provides an important new contribution to the literature about Eastern Europe following the political changes of the early 1990s. Its focus is on housing, which before these changes was dominated in all Eastern European countries by state control and, to a lesser extent, state provision. Here, the contributors aim to describe and analyze the fundamental changes that are now taking place as these housing systems, together with their supporting financial institutions and building industries, are privatized. This book provides an important new contribution to the literature about Eastern Europe following the political changes of the early 1990s. Its focus is on housing, which before these changes was dominated in all Eastern European countries by state control and, to a lesser extent, state provision. Here, the contributors aim to describe and analyze the fundamental changes that are now taking place as these housing systems, together with their supporting financial institutions and building industries, are privatized. The core of the book consists of seven chapters by Eastern European research teams, each covering a different country and providing accounts of local housing systems before and after the recent political changes. The core and supporting chapters all emphasize analysis of housing change with reference to social and political change and discussion of the effects of privatization on the availability and distribution of housing.

"This excellent collection aims to bring the reader up-to-date with the changes in housing legislation, allocation and usage patterns in the post-socialist era." -Europe-Asia Studies
